The Role of Tumor Necrosis Factor-Alpha in the Pathogenesis of Cervical Cytology Adverse Histology. The primary objective was to establish the contribution of type II IFNs in the pathogenesis of the cervical cancer (CC) adverse histology (AdH). Patients with normal smears and positive HPV test were enrolled. IFN-alpha-inducible genes were tested by qPCR in cervical cells. Paraffinized biopsies from 49 CC patients were analyzed for p53, Ki67, Th1 cytokines, and IFNs. A noncancerous cervix was used as a control (NC). Patients with AdH showed a significantly lower expression of IFN-gamma and IFN-gamma-induced genes, while high IFN-alpha expression was associated with a decreased risk of CC AdH. This was independent of HPV status and p53 status. All patients with HPV16 infection showed high IFN-alpha expression, while p53 and IL10 were inversely correlated. p53 protein expression was associated with high IFN-alpha, Ki67, and IL10 expression. The NC showed higher expression of IFN-gamma compared to CC, and IFN-gamma was inversely correlated with p53 and Ki67. Moreover, Ki67 was positively correlated with IL10. This study strengthens the fact that Type II IFNs may be playing
