Menu Tag Archives: microencapsulations Many people know that most medicines are broken down by the stomach and small intestine. With the help of a pill, the body absorbs 100% of the medicine and has no idea if it got broken down into smaller molecules and that is what helps it enter the bloodstream for absorption and from there to do its job in the body. Now we can not only put these medicines into the pill form but we can encapsulate them within a polymeric shell to help protect them from the stomach and small intestine. You will not find a recipe for encapsulating medicines, therefore I will not go into it here. Here is another video tutorial on how to prepare microencapsulated medicines. I have found that if it is not encapsulated, it will easily pass through the stomach and small intestine. Here is a great video tutorial on how to prepare microparticles using oil in water (o/w) emulsification. The pharmaceutical industry does not like to see somebody move in and take over this industry because they do not want competition. They would much rather have you see them as a supplier to the existing companies that use either existing machinery (like a hot melt extruder) or new machinery (like a media mill) to encapsulate their medicines. There are many books about how to do encapsulation and also many industrial distributors like Kelco and DSM that sell equipment. I have
