innocuous protagonist to ever lead a superpower in a comic book. He bumbles through the life of the presidency, bouncing from one diplomatic crisis to the next. It's true, his experience in the military back in his youth helps him in some very specific ways, but the guy is kind of a joke. Many have tried, but no one has managed to make this character anything more than what he is, which is a dude who gets sworn in and becomes President. There was no true essence or attitude of the character. He started as a naive man with big plans in George W. Bush's administration, and he stayed there forever. Although I think the character went over the top in W. Bush's second term as he tried to fight political correctness and those damn Democrats, I was surprised as why the president and the CIA are suddenly working together, go ask a history book. That's the nature of comics. But I always felt there was something odd about the whole thing. I couldn't say what, exactly, but there was something off about it. It seemed very much like someone who had never actually fought in a war just like that, and he was just accepting it without question. It made him look dumb, and sometimes he was kind of dumb. Bush tried, and Obama tried, but neither of them ever
