Clown bags on a stick, a man who wakes up early at work, a man who lives with a self-inflicted facial deformity, and a woman who won at the BBC Skincare Awards (and how much does she hate her face). These are just a few of the pictures I snapped with the camera of my BlackBerry. I'll start with the man who wakes up at 6.45am to go to work... He worked at my local factory for 10 years and I was very fond of him, but I never knew what made him wake up so early. Was it the luxury of Sundays? His own breakfast? A sense of morning duty? Let us never know. The clown is for the party I went to on Saturday. Nothing like a clown, complete with balloons, face paint and a tight fitting red dress to brighten up your day. But there was one girl in the room who I thought just might beat them all for a prize. I'd forgotten the self-inflicted facial deformity until my mum brought the picture to my attention. I'm not sure if it was the reflection in the mirror, the fact that I was half asleep at the time, or the fact that it's so horrifying. The woman I snapped is just a bit like the girl in the picture. It is that face she wears each and every day (so that she can't find love). The woman I snapped is a sister to me. I was too awestruck by the beautiful features to take a picture. I looked away too quickly. The only exception is the flash. And finally there is the man who refuses to work in the factories anymore. He has finally gone back to his mother after a year's probation. He works in the computer games trade. He must have very good teeth because he has very good teeth. A man from the Bronx, who refuses to work on the assembly line at the local factory anymore, has a permanent sneer as a result of a scar, that runs from the side of his mouth to his ear. His brother told him to smile more. I have no idea. What do 648931e174

Silly Putty's ad campaign began in 1956, when its spokesmodel, an ebullient Miss America, and a former disc jockey called Art Linkletter, described the product as "moldable" and said it "won't get out of your house." "We like it right inside the house," he said. By 1963, Silly Putty had such a devoted following that President John F. Kennedy presented it with the National Medal of Technology. The packaging, which still bears the slogan "Great Stuff! It won't get out of your house," was redesigned. As for the name, kids used to like the fact that it wasn't spongy; it took the shape of whatever it touched. The liquid inside was also like rubber, but a softer rubber. To most people today, Silly Putty is probably associated with one of the funniest commercials of all time — the one that culminated in Barbara Billingsley saying, "I like it, it's silly." At first, Silly Putty was not intended for adults. The original ad warned: "Only for children. Not for sensitive adult hands." It was sold at birthday parties; rolled with Play-Doh; used in craft projects; mixed with mashed potatoes and spooned over soft boiled eggs; and even was used in hospitals to help ease pain during surgery. By the 1970s, Silly Putty had just about disappeared from the market except for the odd occasion. Products tested in the mid-1980s had far less moisture, which tended to make the beads stick together. By the end of the 20th century, Silly Putty was once again a market leader, but it was a different product. Not the same silly stuff. In fact, it came in a gel form that,
