March 24, 2008 -- A three-dimensional, high-resolution record of the intricacies of the human brain will be unveiled this weekend. Assembled from a series of brain-imaging studies, the "brain's connectome" consists of about 27,000 brain regions, most of which are "wired" with the others. And in a detailed color rendering, it even shows which areas have which connections. The ultimate goal is to map every component of the brain: neurons, synapses and blood vessels. A host of researchers from at least four countries, including the US and the UK, are vying to achieve that goal. Images of the brain The connectome was pieced together by L. Mark Keidel and his team at the University of California, Irvine, during an international congress at the University of California, San Diego. Keidel's team has used data from more than 100 magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) scans from healthy adults to build a 3D model of the brain with more than 2 million features. "The human brain is like an interactive, very complex computer," Keidel says. A computer programmer can describe the structure of an object by describing its shape and other features, but until now that's all that's known about the brain. The technique would have been impossible to visualize until recently. MRI scanners are getting powerful enough that researchers can create 3D images with such high resolution, the details are so fine, that they can actually see the data on the screen. "We have all of these images we can explore," Keidel says. "Before, we wouldn't have even known it was possible. It's a pretty big deal." The human brain is like an interactive, very complex computer. Mark Keidel The brain's brain Keidel says the connectome project started about five years ago, and has now gone through three "knee" moments. First, the brain is mapped; the graphics can show which regions of the brain are 648931e174

Elgin, Sligo and Roscommon Railway The Elgin, Sligo and Roscommon Railway was a railway that ran from Sligo, County Sligo in Ireland to Elphin, County Roscommon in the Republic of Ireland. It was built between 1877 and 1882, but closed in 1943. The line was opened as the Sligo, Leitrim and Northern Counties Railway, with a branch line from Sligo to Newtownards, County Down, in 1876, and was the first railway constructed in the south-west of Ireland. Route The Elgin, Sligo and Roscommon Railway ran from the junction of the Great Southern and Western Railway (later Great Southern Railways) at Sligo, to the junction of the Great Northern Railway at Elphin; a total of single track, with passing loops at Sligo, Passage East, Cloon and Ballyhaunis. The line ran from the sea for to a level crossing at Barnacave (near the Newtownards end of the line) before climbing to Carnagh (in Roscommon), before descending at Aughrim to Elphin. The line then ran steeply for before descending to the sea at Ballina and Ballyhaunis, and then finally crossing the Sligo River at Boyle by a swing bridge, before climbing to Sligo. Passenger trains ceased in 1932 and the line was closed in 1943. Locomotives The ES&R is notable for operating
