They believe that if people are happy at work, they'll do a better job (or at least strive to do one). It's not the economic argument that makes sense to them. It's the personal one, and it's not about money at all. The logical conclusion? Your company, while it may be profitable, is just as likely to be in trouble as most businesses. The people who run it may be reliable and kind, but they're not the ones who will get it done. It may have been a difficult decision for the chiefs. And the decisions that they make may seem like an anathema to a company's bottom line, but the people they keep are often a lot more important than the ones who are let go. Human capital, the belief that a company's workers are its most valuable asset, is what's important here. It's that human capital — the workforce as a whole — that's the key to a company's survival. What's more, it's not only the executives who are being educated. It's the rest of the employees. Everyone at a company has a stake d0c515b9f4
